Bishop Willard Francis Mallalieu

The death, August 1, 1911, of this sterling man was not unexpected. For some weeks he had been in the valley of the shadow, doubtless catching glimpses of the "land that is fairer than day." But like an old warrior, that he was, he was not anxious to lay down his weapons or take off his armor. There was "good fighting all along the line," and he wanted to be at the front.

He was enthusiastically ambitious for the King he served, that the result of every conflict should be a victory and not a defeat. He could not sit idly by while men were going to death, or great causes were in danger of being crushed. If anyone was down he wanted to help him up.

With such blood in his veins and such virility in his nature, it was not a strange thing that he did not take his retirement from the effective work of the episcopacy in the most gracious manner. He felt that he was still equal to many a hard task. From that day to the time of his last illness it is a question if he did not do more effective work than in any of his previous years. He was busy in publishing books, articles in the church papers, espousing the cause of the needy secondary schools of New England, was in the battle against the saloon, helping the cause of world peace, and urging the forward march of every reform. There was no busier or more active bishop than he.

Zion's Herald said of him:

"He was a dynamo of ceaseless energy and exertion. The last time he was in the office we mentioned the joyous translation of an eminent servant of the Methodist Episcopal Church, who had a wonderful personal sense of God's presence in his last illness, with visions of the life to come; to which this robust Puritan made answer—and we shall never forget it—'Do not talk to me about sickness and death and visions of the bliss of the other life. I do not want to hear it. I have got too much work to do. I have at least five years' work that I must perform before I am ready to die.' Hence we were not surprised to learn that he did not talk about death or heavenly visions or resignation during that five weeks of illness. He did say—but only once or twice—'I fear I am not going to get over this to do my work.' Here is a lesson to be thoroughly conned by those who unreasonably sigh for visions and spiritual ecstasies on sick-beds or at the approach of death. If any man has been faithful to God throughout a long life, and has done his full duty—even works of supererogation, if that was possible—that man is Bishop Mallalieu. God took care of him, gave him long life and great opportunities for Christian service, and called him painlessly and peacefully to himself; but he did not grant to him any open vision of the life to come."

"Servant of God, well done!
Thy glorious warfare's past;
The battle's fought, the race is won,
And thou art crowned at last."
